Obituary.

At 8½ o'clock Thursday last died at his residence in this city, Major Jno. R. Viley.

The death of a citizen of the mind and character of Major Viley, and the consequent loss to a community, county and State, of his example and influence, is a blow of the inscrutable hand of Providence, from which we may well shrink in mournful awe. He was a man cast in a grand mould, and fashioned in his character after the Divine prototype, whose image, in the most exalted principles of justice and right, he bore through the varying fortunes of his eventful life, nobly and well.

Coupled with these rare qualities of mind and character, in Major Viley, was a physical and moral courage that was simply grand. The bulwarks of his noble character were defended by a modest, retiring and almost bashful timidity, which for power and mildness combined, we cannot in memory summon a superior. Never obtrusive, always true, he sought not place or power; but when thrust upon him, he was as true, intelligently true to his high instincts and splendid courage as death to its shaming mark, when it struck him.

In force of character, Major Viley was the equal and peer of extraordinary men. His perfectly adjusted and scrupulously accurate sense of the highest standard of right between man and man, was sublime. He was an utter stranger, in thought and deed, to the tricks of disingenuousness and the subterfuges of natures which fall below the measure of the strongest, boldest and best type of men. His convictions, the result of his well-balanced and clear, strong mind, were necessarily deep and clear, and absolutely free from influences which ordinarily disturb the trembling balance of the majority of minds settling toward final conclusions. He was for twenty-five years a director in the Northern Bank of Kentucky. For many years a Commissioner of the Eastern Kentucky Lunatic Asylum, officer of the Agricultural Association of Fayette county, and Councilman of the City of Lexington. His honorable name and character; his unobtrusive demeanor; his dignity and gentleness; his firmness in and devotion to principle, elevated, graced, and gave dignity to official place and personal association. With affectionate devotion he clung to his friends and associates who were honorable and true. With child-like trust he reposed upon them, and held himself aloof from those whose honor and truth he suspected.

Death, which has all seasons for his own, in the frozen robes of winter and snow, has chilled the warm hand and manly cheek by his embrace.

That embrace will not unlock its cold white hands; nor let the warm blood pulsate again through his veins; nor the heart throb again evermore.

What Death chills and darkens, and the grave covers up from sight, shall grow warm and bright in the noontide glory of that better land, upon which our pilgrim this morning made his first step.

His funeral will take place to-morrow afternoon at 2 o'clock from the Broadway Christian Church, of which he was a member.

in the east. He fell 20 feet off a ladder and onto a strip of concrete. No bones were broken, however, and all he received from the hard fall were some painful bruises. This is the third time Kleckner has taken a rough tumble. Once, while employed at a federal building back east, he fell 40 feet onto the pavement. Another time he tumbled 60 feet out of a tree. No bones were broken during any of his falls. Kleckner thinks that he must be some kin to the India rubber man. Either that, or he still has the same vitality he had when he was a "bouncing baby boy".

While on the vacation trip, Mrs. Kleckner stopped in an Erie, Pennsylvania, store to make a purchase. The item came to $2.50, so she handed the sales clerk two silver dollars and a half. The clerk looked at the two cartwheels for a moment, and then excused herself. She came back presently with the information that the manager had oked the silver dollars as legal tender.

Walter Kleckner, member of the federal building custodial force, ran into some tough luck yesterday, his first day back on the job from a 30-day vacation
